GOVERNMENT SCHOOLS

EARLY AMERICAN SCHOOLS:

America has not always had government funded and operated schools.

Historically, the RESONSIBILITY of educating children belonged to parents.

Parents occasionally shared this RESPONSIBILITY by forming a community or common school.

Children worked at learning one topic until they mastered it and then moved on to learning the next topic.

In these early American schools, ALL children learned and NO CHILD WAS LEFT BEHIND.

GOVERNMENT SCHOOLS:

Government funded and operated schools are designed to emphasize social conditioning over education.

Government's involvement in education makes it expensive and ineffective.

Libertarians recognize that the education of children is too important for the government to handle.

FREE-MARKET SCHOOLS

BENEFITS:

Students in free-market schools (schools not funded or operated by the government), generally, accomplish more academically than their counterparts in government run schools.

Free-market schools, generally, operate at half the cost of schools run by the government.

Free-market schools are seldom plagued with the problems (drugs, pregnancies, gangs, violence, and truancy) that abound in government run schools.

PARENTAL CONTROL:

The free-market competition among schools not operated by the government insures that they are constantly improving the services they provide.

Only free-market schools and home-schooling offer parents total control of their child's education.
